"Life Breaks In celebrates the intangible, investigating the place where interiority and exteriority meet, the mental space where the past ebbs into the present, weaving sense memory, cultural history, and personal recollection by connecting private and public moments in the experience of everyday reality. If tone is everything, this ambitious, humorous, yet serious creative-nonfiction study of mood is a necessary book for our time. . . .

A review by David Lazar. "I'm in the Mood for Love" is a song with lyrics by one of my favorite lyricists, Dorothy Fields, a writer who would fit well in the gallery of mood-inducers Mary Cappello explores in Life Breaks In, her fifth book, just published by the University of Chicago Press. In the song, the lovers are enveloped in a state, with "a cloud above," not in love, but in the mood for it, an antechamber, a separate state, something different from certain feelings.

Review by Melissa Olivera. Mary Cappello begins her fascinating new book, Life Breaks In: A Mood Almanack (University of Chicago Press, October 2016) with two epigraphs. The first, a quote by Virginia Woolf, speaks about the process and problems of diary-keeping as a chronicle of moods when the physical world continually asserts itself: "What happens is, as usual," Woolf writes, "[that I]m going to write about the soul, and life breaks in."
