To address concerns about limited training of psychologists working in long-term care (LTC) facilities, the Psychologists in Long-Term Care (PLTC) organization published Standards for Psychological Services in Long-Term Care Facilities (Lichtenberg et al., 1998). The expanding evidence base for knowledge and skills, the increasing diversity of LTC residents, and the complexity of presenting problems have compounded the guidance psychologists need when providing services in this setting.

With the overall aging of the population and the concomitant need for the provision of mental health care for older adults, professional psychology in long-term care has come of age.

Psychologists are now increasingly practicing in such traditional long-term care settings as nursing homes and in less traditional ones such as rehabilitation units, day centers, partial hospitalization programs, and hospices.
